German site AMZTigers was selling 1,000 reviews for $10,950, which said.

The site also claimed it could help products get a coveted Amazon's Choice status within two weeks.

Websites are selling fake reviews to Amazon merchants who want to boost their products' ratings, an investigation by UK consumer-rights group Which found.

AMZTigers, for example, said sellers could use its network of 62,000 global "active product testers" to increase their sales and revenue on Amazon.

Reviewers were also encouraged to wait a few days after receiving the product to leave a review, and some sites didn't allow the reviewers to return the products after purchase because this can affect the likelihood a product receives a an Amazon's Choice endorsement.

In September, Amazon reportedly removed 20,000 product reviews after a Financial Times investigation suggested that some of the site's top UK reviewers may have profited from leaving positive ratings.

Insider has contacted Amazon and AMZTigers for comment.
