With this being said, let's look at an example from an NFL game.

These are listed below:

Let's use the above bet of -110 for both outcomes on a NFL spread bet.

38% or higher, then you would want to take that bet.

Since the same odds are offered for the Bills to win, the implied probability f or the Bills to win are 43.

However, a 24-7 loss at home to Purdue, followed by a 20-point blowout at Wisco nsin forced the Hawkeyes to tamp down expectations tremendously.

The team recovered for four wins in four tries in November, qualifying for the B ig Ten Championship Game.

The Hawkeyes also lost All-American C Tyler Linderbaum to the NFL, too.

They're not going to qualify for the College Football Playoff anytime soon, and therefore there is no reason to give this prop a second thought.

However, a tight end has never won the Heisman Trophy, and that's not about to change anytime soon.

The underlying strategy is that after the lower-seeded team loses the first two games on the road, they will play their hearts out in Game 3, on home ice, when the series is still within reach.

In sports, injuries happen.

Despite the Warriors being ahead in Game 1 in 2016, it was the Cavaliers who cl awed their way back to win the NBA title.

Although the NBA now uses the 2-2-1-1-1 playoff format, for more than two decade s they had an exception to that rule.

In the 1980's, the NBA changed the playoff format for the finals to a 2-3-2 set-up.

So we've covered the specific aspects of zig-zag theory, and we've throw n some recent numbers from the NBA at you, but what else should you consider?

Suffice to say that a few people would have lost money on the Cavs in this one.

Based on how close these teams were in the regular season, it made sense to bet on the Leafs in Game 5 to make it a close series.

You've done, and the results are in.
